

Toothing Our Horn

Now 67 years old, The Journal of Clinical Psychiatry reaches a worldwide audience of over 35,000 psychiatrists and allied professionals.* The number of submissions to JCP continues to skyrocket. Increasingly, manuscripts come to us from the 4 corners of the globe. Citation index data show that JCP has the highest impact factor among all clinical psychiatry journals in the world. Among all of the world's research and clinical journals, JCP ranks seventh. Perhaps most gratifying, a 2005 syndicated readership survey found that we are the best-read psychiatric journal.† Noteworthy for authors, our peer review process averages 20 days and the time from acceptance to publication is under 6 months.

The success of JCP and its growing international reputation are testimony to the robust vigor of our field. Never before has science informed clinical practice so much to benefit people with mental disorders. And the beat goes on—as neuroscience promises to move forward in the coming years and shed increasing light on the brain's mysteries.

I love my job as JCP's Editor in Chief. Dr. John Shelton and the superb staff at Physicians Postgraduate Press, Inc., in Memphis are unsurpassed in their devotion and excellence as well as the support they provide to the editor and editorial office. My special thanks to Deputy Editor Marlene Freeman and to Assistant to the Editor Pat Adams for their ongoing service—and to our many reviewers, authors, and you, our readers.

—Alan J. Gelenberg, M.D.
Editor in Chief

*Source: Publisher's own data, 2005. Physicians Postgraduate Press, Inc., Memphis, Tenn
†Source: Focus Readership Study, December 2005; PERQ/HCI Research, Princeton, NJ